Dated: 07.11.2025

"A slice of satisfaction, fulfillment, and happiness can be found in the achievement . . . but the real source of consistent, lasting happiness lies in the process."

Eric Greitens, an eminent author, categorises happiness into three primary forms: the happiness of pleasure, the happiness of grace and the happiness of excellence. He opines that these forms, much like the primary colours, create a complete spectrum of human experience. While the happiness of pleasure is fundamentally sensory, ranging from the happiness we encounter amidst the scenic beauty of nature or enjoying a hearty meal after a gruelling trek, the happiness of grace is linked to being grateful for what we have, offering a silent word of gratitude to the Almighty for our families, homes, friends and all that makes our soul beam with joy. And then, there is happiness of excellence, the kind of happiness that comes from the quest of something great, the satisfaction that stems from purpose and transforms into achievement. It is not just mindless persistence, it is mindful productive work. It is a process, a journey, an energy that makes life worth it.

Just as removing any of the primary colours would, invariably, make our range of experiences dull, a precarious balance needs to be worked out between all three forms of happiness, to curate a blend of passion, praise and perseverance; for living a profound and purposeful life.

So, dear students, as you brace yourselves for the next set of assessments, understand the true premise of your dreams, define your aims and chart your pursuits. Seek happiness on all fronts: celebrate small wins; be grateful for your partners in progress; and, most importantly, embrace the journey which is going to make your accomplishment all the more worthwhile.

The onus of responsibility now lies on your shoulders: that's not an obligation to shudder away from, but an opportunity to seize. So, with the right mindset and perspective, with a harmonious blend of all the colours of happiness, prepare to explore life in technicolour. May your endeavours be awarded with success each step of the way.

Kindly refer to the Examination DATESHEET for the upcoming assessments.
